Companies that offer online subscription-style products or services to California consumers are surely aware of California's Automatic Renewal Law (ARL).

Since its enactment over a decade ago, the ARL has arguably provided plaintiff's attorneys another litigation avenue and, at the same time, left defendant companies smarting from individual or even class actions. Despite more ARL lawsuits being filed in California every week, there has been some good news for defendants. Recent case law may provide relief for companies, from entertainment providers to e-commerce to dating websites, as they defend these troublesome lawsuits.
