

An Unlikely Union: Labor Leaders Join Trump In Seeking Changes To NAFTA

June 29, 2017 | | Labor Agreements, Labor And Employment

David J.
Pryzbylski
Partner

President Trump announced earlier this year that his administration will be seeking to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). The president heavily criticized the longstanding trade deal during his campaign, so this came as little surprise. American labor unions also have been critical of NAFTA over the years due to perceived negative impact on American jobs and actively lobbied against its passage back in the '90s. While organized labor by and large tends to support Democratic candidates and officials, unions and the president seem to have found common ground at least on this issue. The Office of the U.S. Trade Representative kicked off public hearings this week regarding the potential changes the U.S. may be seeking to the trade pact, and union representatives made an appearance on June 28. Among others, representatives from the AFL-CIO, Association of Machinists, and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters were in attendance. Union representatives testified that they believed a renegotiated deal should, among other things, prioritize creating more jobs in the U.S. and higher wages. Business leaders and others also are testifying at the proceedings to offer recommendations for what they would like to see in the renegotiated deal. Formal negotiations on NAFTA are expected to begin later this year. For now, at least, it seems some interests are aligned between America's unions and President Trump.

RELATED PRACTICE AREAS

Collective Bargaining
Labor and Employment
Labor Relations

RELATED TOPICS

NAFTA
Trump Administration