

Christina Baugh has a natural strength for working with clients on even the most challenging and complicated business matters because she is pragmatic and analytical. She is able to help clients by providing a realistic, big-picture perspective on litigation and a road map of how to achieve the most cost-effective and efficient remedy.

Christina's practice is comprised of a wide range of business litigation including intellectual property, shareholder disputes, officer liability, insurance coverage, tort claims, commercial litigation, employment litigation and property disputes.

While most of her work involves courtroom litigation where Christina has successfully represented clients in matters in state and federal courts, when that is not the best path to a client's goal, she is equally skilled in arbitration, settlement and negotiation.

Christina represents corporate and individual clients in a variety of commercial matters. She routinely handles business disagreements among business partners and the transfer of ownership and management duties, and also helps address allegations of wrongdoing and officer or director liability. She also advises on shareholder disputes and employment matters, along with insurance coverage dispute matters.

Christina regularly represents clients in disputes regarding their intellectual property rights, including patent, copyright, and trademark rights. Representing a wide range of clients, from small family-owned companies to multibillion dollar corporations, she works to ensure that her clients' rights are protected.

As a long-time Atlanta resident, Christina lives inside the perimeter and enjoys running, visiting local attractions and attending local festivals.
